Not illustrated. 1877 Excerpt: . . . plot into execution, as the guards at the gates were then relieved from their weeks duties, and the people would crowd the courts in greater numbers than during the other days. The incoming guards would secure the west gate, by which they entered the Temple from the town; the outgoing guards would remain in the courts to swell the force round the king. If the western gate of the Temple courts was commanded from the palace, as seems likely enough, the mustering of the Temple police there on the Sabbath morning would not awaken suspicion in Athaliah or any of her people. But the shouting of the crowd in the courts, and the sound of trumpets proclaiming the kings accession, were heard by Athaliah in the royal palace on Mount Zion, the kings house with the royal stables mentioned in both narratives. Knowing that something unusual...
