Total 293,453 B.T.U. equivalent to about 250 lbs. of steam. A triple of such a size will have approximately 3,000 sq. ft. heating surface, and will utilise 6,000 lbs. stoain per hour. The loss then is, for an unlagged triple, about 4. By lagging with suitable material the loss can be reduced to at least one-quarter of what it is with a naked pipe, so that an evaporator may roughly be estimated as losing by radiation 1 of the heat supplied. It is not only the loss of heat that is of importance in a badly-protected evaporator, but any fall in temperature of heating and vapour will tend to lower the efficiency of the apparatus as regards evaporation per unit of heating surface. The condensers which find use in forming and maintaining the vacuum in the last body of a multiple evaporator, may be classed either as jet or surface condensers, or again as dry or wet condensers. Surface condensation is now only employed when the vapour from the last body is used to heat the juice coming from the mills; in these apparatuses the juice circulates inside the tubes, the vapour being outside; in no case will the juice itself be sufficient to condense all the vapour, and the portion uncondensed is condensed by the usual method described below. By utilising the vapour from the last body in this way a certain economy is obtained,...
