Not illustrated. 1875 Excerpt: .bit-work upon them, Drew the straps forthwith through the buckles splendidly plated, And made fast after that the long reins broader (than usual), Led out the horses into the court, where the diligent groom now Had pushed forward the coach, by the pole it easily moving. 140 Evenly measured fastened they then to the balance with unsoled Traces the rapid strength of the readily off-going horses. Hermann took up the whip, then sat he and rolled to the gateway. As the friends now quickly the roomy places had taken, Rolled off the carriage with speed, and left the pavement behind it, 145 Left in the rear the walls of the town and its elegant towers. Thus drove Hermann away, the well known new borough-road by, Sharply, and loitered not and drove uphill as adownhill. As he however now farther the tow r of the village caught sight of, And not far any more were lying the garden-girt houses, 130 Thought he with himself, now in to be holding the horses. By the dignified gloom of stately limes overshadowed, Which now hundreds of years had in this quarter been rooted, Was, with turf overspread, a spacious luxuriant common Facing the village, for peasants and neighbouring townsmen a playground. 155 Flush-entrenched was found in the midst of the trees a well-opening. Went one the steps away down, then benches of stone were discovered, King-wise placed round the spring, which always here livingly welled forth, Limpid, with low-lying wall...
